Higher education team dismays MPs 20th January 2009

The MPs express concern that, when giving evidence to the committee about homeopathy, Prof Beddington had not stressed the importance of evidence-based science. "Professor Beddington is the government chief scientific adviser and we are surprised that rather than champion evidence-based science within government he appears to see his role as defending government policy or, in the case of homeopathy, explaining why there is no clear government policy."

Concern at role of chief scientist

David Turner Financial Times January 20 2009

The government's chief scientific adviser may fail to speak up for policy based on firm scientific evidence because he is trying too hard "to work within the Whitehall machine", MPs have warned. John Beddington was accused in particular of an "equivocal" approach towards homeopathic medicine, which enjoys some NHS support despite debate on its scientific validity - in contrast to much sharper criticism by his predecessor, Sir David King. Prof Beddington told the Commons innovation, universities, science and skills committee on one occasion that homeopathic treatment could be considered "worthwhile"; on another he said there was "not one jot of evidence" to support its use. http://www.ft.com/cms/s/0/3fe2bbbe-e693-11dd-8e4f-0000779fd2ac.html?nclick_check=1

Integration of homeopathy into primary care

By Lewis Blackwell January 23, 2009.

210 primary care doctors were surveyed to find out what forms of evidence they would want before using or recommending an unorthodox therapy. The highest rated form of evidence was systematic examination of outcome, whilst theoretical or laboratory evidence was considered to be least important.

Homeopathic History....

Very interesting history of how the Drug Companies destroyed all natural health therapies in the USA in early part of the last century....

Modern Medicine, Part I: How Healing Illness Became Managing Illness
January 27, 2009.

'The latter half of the 19th century was homeopathy's heyday. Regular physicians could hardly compete with them.' 'John D. Rockefeller had made major grants to homeopathic institutions over the years, and gave specific instructions to Fredrick Gates, his financial advisor, to continue to do so. However, Gates was no friend to homeopathy, and all subsequent grants went only to the orthodox medical institutions; some 300 to 400 million dollars. HOMŒOPATHY EXPLAINED

John Henry Clarke, M. D.

Charles Darwin's researches with the fly-catching plant, Drosera, or Sun-dew. Darwin found that solutions of certain salts of ammonia stimulated the glands of the tentacles and caused the latter to turn inwards. He made this solution more and more dilute, but still the plant was able to detect the presence of salt. Darwin was almost frightened by his results. <http://homeoint.org/books5/clarkehomeo/power.htm>
